I'm doing some camera tracking on the fly and I have this animation where when I move a plane, it loops around the cursor. It looks really slow when it loops around and after a while it seems like it is using a very small number of frames (from 10-20) when it loops. Is this normal for looping around an object or should the number be much higher? A: In certain cases, looping that is not visibly smooth can be caused by the limited number of actual frames captured. Such cases, I'd suggest to try changing the render setting to something that gets rid of the limited frames, like Time or Overlays, to see if that's the issue. Shifting baselines in public health: Caribbean diasporas and the island. This article explores the relative decline of the Caribbean region as a global producer and consumer of public health knowledge and service provision. It uses case studies of two Caribbean diasporas, Trinidad and Tobago and the Cayman Islands, to argue that the Caribbean, like other regions, must move beyond a short-term focus on individual health problems to understand how social and economic processes have worked to produce and maintain inequalities and inequities, which in turn limit national and global public health. The discussion emphasizes the importance of analyzing the socio-political context, including the role of colonialism and global capitalism in the contemporary Caribbean, where population pressures, declining economies, and the legacy of racialized colonial history combine to shape the public health and public health policies of the region.Involvement of endothelial nitric oxide synthase- and cyclooxygenase-derived free radicals in the action of endogenous nitric oxide and prostacyclin in early sepsis.
